It has been suggested that mental health literacy and help-seeking attitudes are related to mental distress and mental illness stigma. Studies exploring the relationship between these factors in primary care are lacking. To explore the relationship between mental health literacy, help-seeking attitudes and mental distress, and to investigate whether mental distress is related to help-seeking. We obtained cross-sectional data from 3,288 Dutch primary care patients (aged 18 years and older) who completed a questionnaire on mental health literacy, help-seeking attitudes, mental distress, and mental illness stigma. The majority of patients (59%) had low mental health literacy and were not aware of mental illness services. However, being more knowledgeable about the causes of mental illness and having lower stigmatizing attitudes were significantly associated with a less negative mental health literacy. After adjustment for mental illness stigma and mental distress, knowledge about mental illness was still significantly associated with a less negative mental health literacy. Lower mental illness stigma was associated with a lower mental distress, but this association was not mediated by help-seeking attitudes. This study provides evidence that mental health literacy may lead to better mental health, and that it is unrelated to mental distress or helpseeking attitudes. More research is needed on how mental health literacy can be promoted.
