Since the latest serious security breach, Photoshop is now available with adware preloaded on all prices, so you should avoid buying the product if you want to keep your data private from the ad companies. Or if you don't want to use any of the built-in tools, you can save yourself the price of the original program and get a free alternative. Lightroom is the result of that, and that alone provides plenty of value. Let me make it clear that Lightroom 5 is far from the worst version of this very popular piece of software. It is not the Photoshop it is, nor the Adobe that judges me, it is just one of the bad aspects. As I described a couple of days ago, as time marches on, Microsoft Edge is starting to slow down enough to replace Internet Explorer. One feature that is still missing these days is the option to block pop-up ads, using the feature that was used in Internet Explorer. I imagine that this will happen soon. In the meantime, we only have to deal with occasional pop-ups and ad-like announcements. An ad-free experience, probably even lower in price, could easily make this not such a big issue anymore. I must also admit that the feature I miss the most today is that of the "Save dialog", that is, the modes I can save a photograph to, such as RAW/CR2, TIFF, JPEG, PSD, HDR and so on. There was a time when this feature required an external application to be run. Think back to one of Lightroom's earliest versions. That was not exactly something you could expect to get by installing a piece of software, however much you might enjoy the freebie features it offers. I believe that Adobe is still working on this feature, and hopefully if not soon, Lightroom will start saving different versions of the picture with different settings, such as saving the RAW version under the scene name mentioned by the RAW files. Or it also could allow you to change the settings for different photographs.
